According to its wording, the GDPR protects the following Schutzgüter: human dignity, human rights, fundamental rights, rights, data protection rights, fundamental freedoms, freedoms, interests, guarantees and personal data. These Schutzgüter appear in 125 provisions of the GDPR. The terminology is highly inconsistent: 24 different wording combinations are used for the aforementioned Schutzgüter.

There is no uniform concept behind the terminology. There are no gradations between fundamental rights, rights, freedoms, interests. It is not concretised which fundamental rights, rights, freedoms, interests are meant. The controversial question whether fundamental rights are applicable between private parties at all is also not merely noted.

In the absence of concretisation, the numerous balancing decisions [\[Tiles BD\]](#) are lacking balancing criteria [\[Tiles BC\]](#), that allow for a structured and consistent assessment. Which fundamental rights, rights, freedoms, interests are to be weighed against which fundamental rights, rights, freedoms, interests in individual cases remains unclear.
